Smallest Leaf Acreage Since 1870 In State

Big Cut in Crop May Mean Better Price if Quality Is Good. Virginia growers this year have planted the smallest tobacco acreage since 1870, according to the Federal-State Crop Reporting Service. Low prices, shortage of plants, and unfavorable weather conditions caused a reduction of nearly 36 per cent in the acreage planted this year of 97,000 acres, compared with last year's harvested acreage of 153,000 acres. Growers planned to reduce their tobacco acreage considerably because of the low price of tobacco. The plant beds were badly damaged by blue mold and insects, so there was an actual shortage of plants. In addition, more than usual replanting was necessary because many plants died or were killed by insects. The estimated acreage by types compared with last year is as follows: Flue-cured, 62,500 acres, a reduction of 37 per cent; fire-cured, 23,400 acres, a reduction of 30 per cent; burley, 7,600 acres, a reduction of 20 per cent; and sun-cured, 3,500, a reduction of 30 per cent.
